Problems of Agricultural Sector in Afghanistan

By Muhammad Rasool Shah

Afghanistan is an agricultural country as majority of people are living in rural areas. So, the agricultural sector is the main source of population depends 95% of the total revenue of the country. A country's level of development and the diversity of its agriculture determines the stability of the food security and safety of the population.

Agricultural productivity is the most important factor for the development of the agricultural sector. Agriculture is a backbone of any developing country that can face a large number of difficulties if it is solely reliant on its agriculture because the land is very arid and water shortage in the area makes the cultivation very difficult or costly, while the weather limits the range of agricultural products that can be grown.

Furthermore, it is likely that Afghanistan has almost all the natural products but their quality cannot be as good as in an agricultural country. It has a variety of climate in different corners of the country that enables the cultivation of various kinds of crop and fruits. Similarly, a large number of crops provide a cheap and convenient source of income for the farmers. However, these countries have adopted latest technology which makes it possible to increase the production of same crops with very less water resources.

It is also unfortunate that the system of marketing and then to different decades never let the country to improve in any direction, either agrarian or industry. We see a lack of good marketing options. It is obvious that the price of agricultural products in the world is very low. Therefore, it is difficult for farmers to get a profit as expected. This has decreased the living standards of the people and consequently the government has to support the farmers. On the other hand, the government has to support the farmers and make them self-sufficient. This has led to food security and stability of the country.

However, the agricultural sector is facing many problems which need to be addressed properly and long term and most coordinated with the country's status. The agricultural development is needed for the country's stability and the capability of the farmers. Since it is the absence of a proper system of irrigation. Almost 90% of our farmers depend on the natural system of irrigation, which makes the area very vulnerable to disease and drought. The lack of adequate water supply due to the drainage of the rivers results in the destruction of the crops. Therefore, the government needs to take measures to improve the irrigation system and make the farmers self-sufficient. Besides, the water supply should be regulated to prevent water pollution and overuse of water resources.

Moreover, the government needs to make proper plans by making the present system of irrigation and new plans and design the system to provide a well-designed system of irrigation to the country. Similarly, due to the lack of water resources, an adequate water flow into the rivers would lead to the desertification of the country, the desert is spread in the desert. The government needs to take measures to prevent the desertification of the country. The water should be distributed properly and efficiently to the farmers.

The editor has decided that it was defeated by the Taliban in Kabul.

The United Nations, which has urged the United States government to go to Afghanistan to negotiate a peace agreement, has made some progress in its efforts. The UN peacekeeping mission in Afghanistan has expanded its mandate to include an investigation into allegations of war crimes and human rights abuses.

The Taliban has continued to expand its territory and control over large areas of Afghanistan. The US-led coalition forces have been fighting against the Taliban in various parts of the country.

In other news, a number of Afghan citizens have been killed or injured in recent attacks. The government has announced a military operation against the Taliban in the eastern province of Nangarhar.

The situation in Afghanistan remains complicated and volatile. The government continues to face challenges in stabilizing the country and providing security to its citizens.
U.S. House Defies Obama Veto Threat, Passes Defense Policy Bill

WASHINGTON — The House defied a presidential veto on Friday and approved a $740 billion defense policy bill that Democrats cumplen, boosts budget limits on military spending and makes it harder for the White House to close the U.S. prison for suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

The vote was 283-178, far short of the 290 to 217 margin required to override the veto, but sufficient to show that many lawmakers are committed to an ambitious spending program for a military that some say is approaching its limits.

Defense Secretary Leon Panetta opposed the bill, arguing it would reduce the number of troops the military could deploy abroad and undermine the Defense Department's ability to carry out its mission.

The bill, which would fund the military through September 2012, also includes $32 billion in spending for the war in Afghanistan, bringing the total to $776 billion for the war in Afghanistan.

US Needs to Push Ahead with Handover of Afghan Aviation

NEW YORK - After spending more than $500 million over 12 years rebuilding Afghanistan's four international airports, the United States is still running Afghan civil aviation and needs to ensure its hands over control, a watchdog agency said on Friday.

John Sopko, head of the Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction (SIGAR), said international funds had helped rebuild Afghanistan's civil aviation system but it had been hard to train enough local or multi-country.

Alaska failure by the Afghan government to meet the "needs of the people", SIGAR said in its latest report.
