Taliban's Ambiguous Policy

By Hujjatullah Zia

The Taliban militants are waging record-breaking raids, capturing key towns and districts, and engaging in fierce battles with Afghan security forces. As predicted, Afghan policemen are suffering in heavy numbers as they try to repel the Taliban attacks to save lives. The Taliban, which is growing rapidly, is still in control of large areas and continues to gain power, especially in the southern and eastern provinces. The situation is dire, especially in Kandahar, Helmand, and Nangarhar, where the Taliban have a strong presence. The Afghan government is struggling to contain the Taliban's advances and has been forced to seek help from international partners. However, the international community is divided on how to respond to the Taliban's aggression, with some countries providing military aid while others are hesitant to intervene.

Deteriorating Taliban Situation

Afghan security officials say that the country is on track to see fighting last year. The Taliban have been gaining ground, and their successes have been felt across the country. In Kandahar, the Taliban have seized control of several districts, while in Herat, they have captured key locations. The situation in Kabul is also concerning, with the Taliban increasing their presence in the capital.

The Afghan government has been criticized for its inability to defend its citizens and territories. International pressure has mounted on the government to take action against the Taliban. The United States, in particular, has increased its involvement in the conflict, promising to provide military support to the Afghan forces.

The Taliban's ambitions are clear, and the Afghan government must act decisively to prevent a full-scale invasion. The country's security forces must be strengthened, and international support must be secured to help the Afghan government in its fight against the Taliban. The situation is urgent, and the Afghan government must act now to prevent a full-scale Taliban invasion.
1) President Chahal was deposed by Afghanistan only because of his inability to manage the failure of talks towards Pakistan as new partners. According to him, Chahal was an ex-President of Afghanistan for the past 25 years, and his policies did not work. Pakistan has been trying to achieve an agreement with Afghanistan, which has not been successful so far. Pakistan is aware that the situation in Afghanistan is in favor of Pakistan and the government is progressing in the right direction. Pakistan has always been concerned with stability and security in Afghanistan. According to him, Pakistan is ready to provide any assistance needed to achieve a peaceful resolution of the conflict in Afghanistan.
