HRW Wants Aid Donors to Stress Accountability

HUMAN RIGHTS WATCH

KARUL - A leading rights group on Monday urged Afghan government and foreign donors to provide the government with the necessary resources to address the country’s persistent human rights problems at a major international meeting of senior officials.

The meeting is an agenda item at the latest in a series of meetings of senior officials.

HUMAN RIGHTS WATCH issued the call in letters to representatives of donor countries, who were scheduled to gather in Kabul on September 3 for the Senior Officials Meeting to discuss human rights and security commitments to the country.

The meeting is a follow-up to the December 2014 London Conference and the 2012 Tokyo Conference.

The meeting in Kabul is expected to discuss the situation in Afghanistan, the Human Rights Watch said in a statement.

The remarks come amid reports of rising attacks against Afghan government and security forces.

HRW said in a statement that it will continue to monitor the situation in Afghanistan and will publish reports as appropriate.

The Inevitability of Institutions

By Dilawar Sharzi

The incapacity of human beings to live alone on their own has led to the formation of groups. Calculating and strategic thinking are qualities of human beings. The capacity of people to interact and communicate with each other has brought them closer. The phenomenon of human beings has led to the formation of societies, wherein people live with co-operation and help one another. Some fellow beings. Arpalists had already observed, "Man is a social animal." He cannot be otherwise; therefore, they would have to live in groups in order to protect each other and to exist in life.

The most fundamental forms of collective efforts in human society – the society they be the largest of such endeavors; they may include groups, syndicates, organizations, associations, institutions, religions and many others. They can either be intentional or spontaneous. The intentional ones are created by the members for a specific purpose while the spontaneous are created by other groups which are intentionally designed: they can also be called as formal ones, whereas the collective efforts are the result of general social interaction and behavior.

Sociologists call most of these collective efforts institutions, like the institutions in sociology include family, marriage, sports, and even religion. The basic requirement for an institution, in one sociological definition, is that the collective effort should be directed towards a common goal. A group of goals, if pursued, creates an institution to which they may be formed to educational, economic, social, religious, or political purposes. In the modern world of ours the institutions have a very important role in society. The main reason for this is due to the rapid changes in society, and human societies have been institutionalized.

The institutions that are well-managed, multiply the human capacity to achieve goals. So the achievements of mankind are due to the institution. The achievement of institutions makes it possible that it is through the institutions that the capacity of mutual cooperation and the nature of society is judged as a certain extent. The most collective, organized, and the most effective way of achieving social goals is through the institution. The interaction of the institutions together and the policies of the different institutions are the result of institutionalization, based solely within European countries after the Industrial Revolution. The growing demands of the industries and economy has led to the growth of institutions. Many institutions have developed out of this.

Further, it was possible for individuals to control the large institutions through the development of collective efforts. With the rise of capitalism in Europe the number of private companies and businesses was able to exert control over large groups of people. In addition, the institution of the state and the army has added to the number of institutions existing in the society.

Institutions have not only increased in number, but also in diversity. Although they have not been able to control all social units, they have a significant role. Institutions are classified into five groups: political, economic, social, cultural, and religious. This classification is based on the number of institutions, the degree of importance, and the division of labor. Institutions are classified into various groups, and in this context, we can make use of the quotations of the English writer and Ukrainian Afghani Mohammad Nazar Khanda, who was the first writer to translate the book into English.

The Inevitability of Institutions

The man who replaced Omar, Malik Abakar Mohammad Manzori, was Omar’s deputy and has been effectively leading the Taliban since the death of former Taliban head of state. His selection seems to suggest that the Haqqani Network, a fact that has gradually become enough to realize the Taliban’s new leader is already in charge of the military and the political wing of the group.

The two deputies in Manzori, however, are one of the leaders of the Taliban and the other is a member of the Haqqani Network. Both are close to the Haqqani. That signals a kind of grand coalition among the senior leadership of the Haqqani network and the Taliban leadership that has struggled for dominance over the years. The most logical conclusion by the British newspaper The Stratton and the Haqqani have concluded that, at this moment, presenting Talibani unity is more important than their squabbling. Furthermore, strengthening this interpretation is the announcement to come back to line and in line to maintain control over the group, which is done immediately on the public acknowledgement of Omar’s death. But another important faction among the Taliban consists of Mullah Manzoor, who is the second most influential leader of the group and the next leader of the Taliban. Mullah Manzoor is the son of the late leader of the Taliban, Mullah Omar, who was killed by a U.S. drone strike in 2015. Manzoor is considered to be the most important leader among the Taliban and is known for his close ties with the Haqqani Network. He is believed to be the de facto leader of the Taliban since the death of his father.

Manzoor is considered to be the most important leader among the Taliban and is known for his close ties with the Haqqani Network. He is believed to be the de facto leader of the Taliban since the death of his father.

The Talibani are currently divided into two main groups: the Haqqani Network and the Mullah Manzoor. The Haqqani Network is considered to be the most powerful and influential group among the Taliban, and is known for its close ties with Pakistan. On the other hand, Mullah Manzoor is considered to be the most moderate and acceptable leader among the Taliban, and is known for his close ties with the United States. Both groups are believed to be working towards a political solution to the ongoing conflict in Afghanistan, and are working towards a political solution to the ongoing conflict in Afghanistan.
22 Concerns on the project is launched, he said.
