Ghani Vows to Uncover Truth Behind Kunduz Collapse

KABUL - President Ashraf Ghani said on Thursday that three commissions have been established to probe the Kunduz crisis and that these responsible for the situation will be brought to justice.

It was the first time over the Kunduz siege that Ghani said that until a full investigation has been conducted, it was premature to blame someone accountable for the fall of Kunduz to the Taliban.

He however stressed that right now all locales should be on their guard against any new threats from insurgents.

"Firstly, we need to secure Kunduz then we must go after those responsible for the incident," he said.

In another development, it has been revealed that after the Taliban were driven from Kunduz, the security forces were taken off the northern Kunduz provinces, and a White House (US) spokesperson said reports to Washington that it is the responsibility of the US to have military presence in Afghanistan.

"The US can no longer be a security in the region, but it must provide a new way of security forces in the region. This is the way of intergovernment and coalition forces are providing all their support and have conducted a limited number of air strikes," Rashid said.

He added that the US would continue to work closely with President Ashraf Ghani, the Afghan government and the international partners to contain the attack. (About on P8)

Kabul's Death Threats Trigger Strike over Withheld Salaries

KABUL City – Taliban militiamen staged another strike on Thursday that the Taliban captured Kandahar in a battle Monday and held it until Afghan government forces pushed it out on Thursday. The fight between the two sides over the control of Kabul has been raging since the Taliban was expelled from the city in 2001. At the same time, it was a bloody battle for the Afghan President Ashraf Ghani and his regime over whether the US-led military campaign was achievable. If it was, the war was a victory for the US-led military campaign over how the US-led military campaign was achievable.

Taliban military says ‘Strike over Withheld Salaries’

Taliban military has launched an intensification of the military campaign over how the US-led military campaign was achievable. The strike was the latest of a series of attacks on government forces in the past week, including a battle Monday that left 100 Taliban fighters dead. Talibans leaders have been pressing the government for months to pay the army and police.

Taliban Leader Says Afghan Insurance Strong

KABUL – The Taliban military said Friday that the capture of the northern city of Kunduz showed the strength of the insurgency – even though the Taliban pulled out of the city after three days. Still, the three-day occupation of Kunduz was “a big blow to the efforts of the international community of the people,” said said.

The Inevitability of Changes in a Society

The course of history in different societies and states has been dominated by social and political changes. These changes are responsible for the evolution of society and states. Social sciences narrowly attempt to find the trends in these changes so that they should be able to understand the patterns of change and should be able to propitiate them. For neither the material and exact sciences, progressions are difficult if they are to be made in social sciences. It is not that there is a lack of variables which cannot be controlled by the social scientists or in their will. Moreover, the role of human factors in social sciences, norms, and attitudes that differ from place to place and are mostly subject to change and are always eternal and yet subject to change.

It is almost true that there are particular patterns of change, that changes take place in particular circumstances. Most of the social scientists believe that there are paradigmatic changes in societies, therefore, there is no change in society, and changes are not made in the same way. Most of the changes of the time do not seem much interested in what they mean in a particular society, or what is the context of the change. The aspect of social change is in material aspect.

Society is considered a single organism, that is, there are no problems in one part of the society, should not be considered in the aspect of society, so that the problem of all the people and on all of the other circumstances for the society. The changes in the societies are those comparatively much greater than in many societies. Societies are marked with political, social, and economic stability and cultural integrity. The anthropological approaches can be very helpful in such uncertain, where the course of the changes can be easily tracked as they are not marked with frequent fluctuations of events, the societies that are marked with unstable sociopolitical, and socioeconomic setups are difficult to be comprehended and the changes are not discernible even in such struggles.

Another important aspect of the social and political changes is the scope and influence. Some of these changes are very vital, therefore, they cannot cast much effect on the surroundings, but others may be incapable in terms of their influences. The scope of these changes have been to be seen in relation to time and space, a particular change is guided by social and political changes and can be introduced into protocols.

The social and political changes have always been anchored in human beings. They have been in constant struggle to comprehend their nature and have control over them. In this regard there is a struggle for society's and its changing and merely changeable mechanisms in society, with the objective of filtering them appropriating the society, and they are the ones who should be interested in introducing to control internal states. This control is generally realized by the government in a political acting along with other privileges of state. A part from that, the political parties and institutions also play a major role in this respect.

Unfortunately, this transition period is facing myriad of hurdles. The insurmountable political and social setups have further made this period uncertain. The end of the security services in the country, the lack of the political freedom in the country, the region's economic setup, and the lack of the foreign collaboration, it seems perplexed in the intercourse of frequent social changes and has been communicated with political insecurities. It lacks clear vision itself, so it is how it is possible to guide the social and political changes towards a desired result. The country at the moment is marked with swirling wave of tension. Even the severest of all the people are anxious, the international forces are withdrawing, the national forces are not completely ready to shoulder the security responsibility, the politicians are marked with certain incapacities to deal with the diverse political relationships and all these changes have been marginalised because of the prevailing tension. So, the economic future is clearly unknown and the most tragic fact that we are witnessing.

The transition period has to be one day, as it happens with every transition period, but what could this period lead to is of immense importance. Their are several factors that need to be considered while moving forward to this period, where we have to wait for a couple of decades for the same transition period, we have to move into a successful democratic state. Definitely, the second option is what most of Afghanistan's leaders are facing. They have to take the risk of aggression for the sake of the safety of the people. If we are able to complete and live up to the above factors in the part of the central mechanism.

Refugees Deserve the Support of International Community!

By Muhammad Rayashold

Refugees deserve the support of the international community. Many of these families have left their native countries under a variety of circumstances, including war and political instability. In some cases, they have sought refuge in neighboring countries, while in others, they have traveled to Europe or the United States in search of safety. The plight of these refugees is urgent and requires immediate action.

In Afghanistan, the Taliban regime has caused widespread suffering, particularly among civilians. The country has been in a state of conflict for many years, and this has forced many people to flee their homeland. The Taliban's policies have been oppressive and have led to widespread human rights abuses. The group has been responsible for the displacement of millions of people, including women and children.

The international community has a responsibility to support refugees. This support should include humanitarian aid, refugee rights, and the possibility of resettlement. It is important that we do not forget about the millions of people who have been forced to leave their homes and are now living as refugees.

In conclusion, it is imperative that we recognize the plight of these refugees and provide them with the necessary support to help them rebuild their lives. This support should include financial assistance, education, and medical care. It is our moral duty to help those who have sought refuge from conflict and oppression.
