By Dr. Steven Kwon

Exclusive for the Daily Outlook Afghanistan

The Korean government has been working for over 40 years to visit Afghanistan. During those times, I have noticed the many restrictions and obstacles that have prevented the progress of the country. However, in recent years, the Korean government has implemented a new policy to help the Afghan people. This policy promotes economic development, musical, and cultural exchanges between the two countries. It has also led to the implementation of technical cooperation and assistance projects in Afghanistan.

Inclining Corruption Amidst Declining Economy

Every day we undertake on account of greater interest is designed a richer service that nourishes and fortifies our faith. If one tends too closely or precipitously towards the extreme ends of virtue and piety, the inordinate influence of the society being abroad in the atmosphere and initiating the cycle of evil. Afghanistan suffers the most at the hands of prolonged war. The four decades of war have wrought nothing else except ruin, discord, and destruction. The long war denudes economic infrastructure completely and dug Afghanistan towards abandonment. No significant economic growth is possible unless Afghanistan is able to achieve economic recovery. The country’s economy is the bedrock on which we stand. It is the base of our national identity and has a profound impact on the stability and security of the region. Afghanistan is currently facing many economic challenges, including corruption, which is a significant issue.

We have to admit the core behind the failure to strengthen the backbone of the economy. The government’s corruption is the most significant obstacle to the economic growth we have witnessed. The government must work on finding a way to combat the root causes of this problem. This is an urgent issue that needs to be addressed.

The United Nations Development Group (UNDG) took the initiative in coming to investigate the corruption issue in the government. In an agreement with the government, a UNDP mission was the first to visit Afghanistan to inquire into the issue of corruption. After this investigation, the United Nations Development Group (UNDG) decided to work on a plan of action to combat corruption in the government.
