he modern science and arts, though have brought comparative light on the whole world, and also opened the door of new progress and civilization, but not the total elimination of all the evil from the society. Nowadays, every society is moving towards the betterment, but this progress is being affected by several factors, one of which is the modern science and arts. It is said that modern science and arts have brought great changes in the world, but they have also brought many problems. One of the philosophers who criticized the modern science and arts is Bertrand Russell, who said that modern science and arts are like "two swords", one of which is good and the other is bad. Russell believed that modern science and arts have the potential to create a new world, but this potential is only realized by some countries.

In his opinion, the modern science brings many benefits to society, but it also brings many problems. One of the most significant problems is the misuse of modern science and arts. Russell believed that modern science and arts should be used for the betterment of society, but if they are used for the wrong purposes, they can cause more harm than good. Russell also criticized the modern science for its lack of moral values and its tendency to prioritize scientific progress over ethical considerations.

Russell argued that modern science and arts should be used with caution and that they should be guided by ethical principles. He believed that the modern science and arts should be used to improve the quality of life, but they should not be used to justify or excuse the use of violence, aggression, and exploitation.

Russell's views on modern science and arts are still relevant today, as the world continues to grapple with the challenges of scientific and artistic progress. The modern science and arts are essential for the development of society, but they must be used responsibly and ethically.
